EXPIRED GRANTS COULD AID ALZHEIMER'S RESEARCH

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

LAS VEGAS, NEVADA. Monday, November 28, 2016—Funding for Alzheimer's research might already exist and it's hiding in plain sight in the form of expired federal grants.

The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) has approximately $651 million in expired grant accounts as of September 30, 2015 according to the Government Accountability Office¹. A significant portion of these funds could be eligible for Alzheimer's research.

Expired grants are those beyond a project's end date but not yet officially closed by the federal government due to delays by either the grantee or the awarding agency. Until grant accounts are closed, the unspent funds remain locked in HHS' grants management system, unavailable for other projects.

Every federal grant has its own unique purpose and some of the expired funds might not qualify for Alzheimer's activities, but if there are enough expired research-oriented grants, it's possible those funds could be redirected to Alzheimer's efforts through administrative action by the next HHS Secretary or the President.

"It's a long shot but it's worth exploring," says Dave Farley, CEO of The Grant Doctors, "If the new administration can expedite the closure of these expired grants, it might be a good source of funds—already intended for research—that won't require Congressional action and won't pull resources from existing health initiatives."
